

Why I want to be a Firefighter

Walking into a burning building into a smoke filled room, hearing a voice yell for help. Risking your life to save another is just one of many jobs that a firefighter does. Firefighting is a risky job, but it also comes with benefits such as knowing that you are the person responsible for saving another persons life. I would like to become a firefighter for many reasons.

Firefighting has always interested me. From playing with toy firetrucks to owning my first fireman's hat, I have grown to enjoy this career for many years. The most important reason that stands out as to why I want to be a firefighter is helping save peoples lives who are in danger. It would be a privilege to help save peoples lives. Going into a burning building and seeing a person who I know now that their life is in my hands makes me feel so important and heroic. Another reason would be that it forms a very strong relationship between fellow employees. Firefighters form great bonds between each other and they form a family setting: everyone is happy and they all get along together. To me, this would be great because it allows me to make new friends and people who I know that I can count on in the long run. Lastly, I would like to be a firefighter because I would be looked up to as a hero in my community. People would appreciate me and idolize me since I would help save lives. This would make me feel great and special in so many ways.

Firefighting interests me in many ways. It helps save peoples lives, it forms lasting relationships between fellow employees, and it comes with many heroic reputations formed within the community. Firefighting has many benefits that help ensure a safe and protected community. It would be a dream for me to become a firefighter one day so that I can protect and serve my people to ensure their safety. I want to assist in the safety of my people and my community for the rest of my life.

By: Cole Vander Veen